FIRE FIRE DESIRE

A LOVE ODYSSEY IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

„It is a subversive act, not to accept aging, but to do something, to return to a better time.“

Martin Suter

SYNOPSIS

Swiss filmmaker Steff Gruber finds a video guide for sex tourists on the internet. He believes he recognizes his Thai ex-girlfriend Malee in the video. He finds himself obsessed with wondering what became of her. Finally, after 25 years, he travels back to Southeast Asia to look for Malee.

This is the beginning of an eventful journey that takes the filmmaker all across Southeast Asia. In his travels, he meets several so-called expats - western emigrants, looking to try their luck in Southeast Asia.

One of these expats recognizes Malee in a photograph, and also remembers her boyfriend as well, the supposed creator of the sex travel video who goes by the name of Roman Guy. Now the search for Malee shifts to a search for Roman Guy.

The filmmaker learns that Roman Guy was very well known in the expats scene at that time, and notorious as well, for his alleged contacts with the CIA. However, he seems to have disappeared over a decade ago.

Meanwhile, old footage that was recorded with a hidden camera in Cambodia in the 90s surfaces. A friend plays the footage for Gruber. It shows countless prostitutes and their external circumstances from the time when the UN peace corps of the UNTAC (United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia) were stationed in the country.

In one of the videos the filmmaker finds a further clue to the sought-after Malee.

Gruber's film weaves together the different destinies of Asian girls and aging emigrants along with the historical video footage to produce a remarkably complex tapestry of the culturally changing Southeast Asia. The odyssey, which borrows its structure from Joseph Conrad's „Heart of Darkness“, ends in the border triangle of Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam. Where the Ho Chi Minh trail once ended, Roman Guy resides in a jungle brothel completely isolated from the modern world. The film ends in an analogy of a Conrad sentence: „Do me a favor: tell them all I've done, everything that you've seen. Because if there is one thing I hate, it is the stench of lies.“

FILMMAKER'S COMMENTARY

„It is for the act of creation that one leaves.“
Ways of Escape by Graham Greene

The theme of this film, set against the backdrop of a multifaceted love story, is my personal struggle with my own aging, my longing for my lost youth and the prospect of my remaining years.

The older expats, who have all had to pay their own price to live in this presumed paradise, serve as a mirror to my own life. I'm also preoccupied with the fate of young Asian women alongside western adventurers.

The view through my camera and my attitude at the composing bench is unbiased; I don't classify my actors "good" or "evil". I see myself as a documentarist faithful to the truth. My protagonist quotes Bob Dylan: „The truth has many different levels.“

These levels exist in my films to satisfy a dramaturgical principle. Black and white is to me only a property of my cited video material. I dismiss any judgments from the audience. The work must stand by itself.

Today, documentary films committed to investigative journalism come from sensational revelations, where „good“ can be clearly distinguished from „evil“. This might address the wish of the viewer, who likes to take the side of the "good". But this is not interesting, because the world is far more complex and has many facets. I explore these various levels by the means of film. Subtle portraits result from the many interviews I conducted with expats and Asian ladies. One must listen carefully. Sometimes the core of the statement lies between the lines, or in what is not said.

My camera is my personal microscope, which I use to better understand the world.

I was five years on the road making this movie. These long time observations enabled insights into the characters and the souls of the people I portrayed, that would not have been possible through sporadic contacts. This method enabled me to document the development of the people involved. When I first interviewed him in 2009, the expat George, for instance, was an aggressive sex tourist, whose world turned around solely to satisfy his lust. Four years later, he looks completely changed both outside and inside. Not only does he fight against increasing impotence, he also sees the world through different eyes. I also changed during the filming. I changed not only by meeting the love of my youth, Malee, and the confrontation with Roman Guy, my alter ego. I also learned I could move my personal limits. Even my point of view, my outlook of the world, is different today, post FIRE FIRE DESIRE.

My film-documented trip through Southeast Asia is also a travelogue through the thoughts of a Lawrence Durrell or a Bruce Chatwin; the images of the outer world illustrate the inner world. The metaphor from Joseph Conrad's „Heart of Darkness“, the journey on the river up into the jungle, where the renegade Colonel Kurtz lives as self-appointed ruler, has a place in our cultural heritage. The metaphor has been applied several times in the history of cinema, and has often been used as a dramaturgical structure. Impressive examples include Werner Herzog's „Aguirre, the Wrath of God“ and Francis Ford Coppola's „Apocalypse Now“. Thus my „Kurtz“, Roman Guy, lives on a river in the hard-to-reach Golden Triangle of Cambodia, Vietnam, and Laos. Here, where during the Vietnam War there was once the Ho Chi Minh trail, and where weapons, supplies, and Vietcong fighters were conveyed through areas controlled by the Americans in South of Vietnam, Roman Guy runs a brothel.

In the medium of the film, I invite the viewers to travel with me across Southeast Asia, and to look into various mirrors, which I have discreetly constructed for them on the wayside.

The expat Joe asks in the film: „People go away and disappear and then you've got to find them. Why? Why do you have to find them? It's because you want to know what they know. He knew something I didn't know and I have to find it also.“
